Three bridal hairstyles for an inverted triangle face shape

An inverted triangle face has a forehead wider than the jaw and tapers towards the chin. Three bridal hairstyles work in different ways. A low bun with loose strands shows your neckline, jaw-length waves add fullness beside the chin, and a half-up style with a side part keeps the length of your hair in view. Try each with your veil to compare the profile.

A low bun with face-framing strands

A bun at the nape keeps the crown smooth and shows off the neckline of your dress. Let a front section turn gently away from your face. A strand that falls to your jaw frames it differently from one that stops at your temple. Tuck it up, then let it down to see which length you prefer.

Soft waves that open out at the jaw

If you feel most like yourself with your hair down, let the fullest part of the wave sit at or just below your jaw. Tuck one side behind an ear to show an earring. Try both sides before settling on your parting.

A side-parted half-up style

Pinning the top sections loosely at the back keeps the length on show and leaves room for a comb or veil. If you're wearing a veil, try it where you want it to sit. Check the side view as well as the front, ideally with your earrings and the neckline of your dress in view.

How much hair should you pull back?

For a half-up style, pull back a wide section above each ear, then try a narrower one. Narrower sections leave more hair beside your jaw. You can keep the fullness lower down while still wearing your hair off your forehead.
